Canada's ability to build — homes, infrastructure, and resilient communities — depends on a deeply interconnected ecosystem spanning materials, skilled trades, engineering, and construction. Produced in conjunction with the Cement Association of Canada, this special feature will spotlight how cement and concrete underpin economic growth, support critical infrastructure, and are evolving through clean technology and innovation. As Canada advances priorities around housing, productivity, and sustainable development, the strength of this integrated sector is increasingly central to national competitiveness.

How cement underpins Canada's built environment: Exploring the essential role of cement and concrete in housing, infrastructure, and community development across the country.

An integrated construction ecosystem: Spotlighting how architects, engineers, contractors, and materials suppliers work together to deliver complex projects at scale.

Infrastructure as an economic driver: Examining how transportation networks, energy systems, and public works support trade, mobility, and long-term productivity.

Advancing low-carbon materials: Exploring innovations in cement production, including carbon capture, alternative fuels, and lower-emission solutions.

The future of the skilled trades workforce: Highlighting the growing need for trades and technical talent to meet demand for housing and infrastructure.

Strengthening domestic supply chains: Looking at how locally produced cement supports resilience, reduces reliance on imports, and reinforces Canada-first approaches to building.
